NORTH South University's Career and Placement Centre hosted a seminar titled Her Leadership, Her Legacy: Shaping Careers, Shaping Tomorrow, marking International Women's Day, at the NSU in Dhaka on Sunday.

The event brought together a diverse community of faculty, staff and students to discuss the evolving role of women in the global workforce, said a press release.

Barrister Rashna Imam, a senior advocate of the Supreme Court of Bangladesh, was present as chief guest at the seminar.

Drawing from her extensive experience in the legal arena, Rashna Imam shared moving insights on how to navigate high-pressure professional environments with resilience and an unwavering moral compass.

Her perspective was complemented by the academic leadership of Farzana Nahid, director of the Career and Placement Centre, alongside Professor Nazlee Siddiqui, director of MBA/EMBA programmes, and Nazia Manzoor, assistant professor and chairperson of the department of English and modern languages.

Together, these leaders provided a multi-disciplinary look at how mentorship and institutional support are not just helpful tools for individual growth but essential foundations for building a more equitable future.

Beyond celebrating professional milestones, the seminar bravely addressed the pressing social challenges facing women in Bangladesh today.

The speakers engaged in a critical dialogue regarding the recent rise in sexual assault incidents, emphasizing that career development could not be separated from the fundamental right to safety.

Rashna Imam highlighted the vital role of the legal system and public accountability, urging the audience to remain vigilant and informed of their rights.

The panel collectively called for a shift in societal culture, one that actively challenged harassment and demanded stronger reporting mechanisms and collective responsibility within both public and professional spaces.
